of peace negotiations, if not during them, it will emerge as a greater one. The significance of the British determination not to allow East Africa to revert to German hands is largely concerned with the Cape-to-Cairo enter-prise. It is now realized that Germany had laid plans for checkmating, both the political and commercial aims of the great transcontinental system. German maps of East Africa, drawn before the war, show several pro-jected parallel railroad lines crossing German territory from the coast, and stretching out their tentacles to the Kongo and beyond toward the Atlantic seaboard. These roads Atlantic seaboard. These roads crossed at several points the proposed route of the Cape-to-Cairo line. Had they been completed, they not only would have enabled Germany to control strategically the whole rival sys-

The war has not arrested the progress of construction, and each year some notable additions are made to the long line.

It is not unlikely that the great road from end to end of Africa will
in the undertaking, and from all opportunity of continuing active hostiltiy toward it, clears the ground for an amicable program of joint effort an amicable program of joint effort among the allies, and assures a peaceful and generous development of Africa's resources. Although Great Britain, France, Portugal and Bel-gium are the only nations now con-cerned in building up means of communication in Africa, there is, indeed, a strong probability that some degree of railway internationalization will result from peace council endeavors to adjust the colonial claims of the belligerents. This would be a long stride in the direction of international control of the colonial council control contro national control of central Africa, be-tween the Zambesi and the Sahara, as advocated by the British labor party and by a growing number of publicists and statesmen in Great Britain and the allied nations.

The Senate today without a record vote referred to the Senate military committee a resolution introduced by Senator New of Indians calling for an investigation into conditions at the military debarkation camp at Brest, France, at which American troops are quartered pending departure for America. The resolution resulted from charges that the camp was insanitary and thigh deep in mud. Senator Thomas of Colorado said the War Department was now making an investigation and suggested that time would be saved by post poning the resolution, but Senator New sought to have it called up for consideration. Upon Senator Thomas motion, it was referred to the committee. FINANCIAL.
